Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Report on Conflicting Translations: In the Documents of Our Boundary Question With Chili If we are to be guided by every known dictionary of both languages, the Spanish for summit is cima ; but the vocable summit is continually applied in English to indicate both the highest point of a mountain or hill and the comb of a ridge or the sawlike edge of a range; although the former may be the vertex of a cone, a pinnacle, a topmost point, whilst the latter is a summit line. Hence the translation of cima and cumbre by the same word summit, in dictionaries which are deficient and in fact of little or no help to a conscientious translator of important documents. A cumbre is decidedly a summit line. It cannot but be a line, as it serves to indicate the topmost part of the Andes; and also because said part is the broken, jagged and castellated back of the cordilleran crests, - the crests formed by the intersection of the opposite slopes, as San Roman and Bertrand express themselves. The topmost part of a cordillera is its edge or crest: the topmost part of a peak or an isolated mountain is its summit. The Andean crest has numerous summits and therefore is described as crowned with peaks and volcanoes a mountain has only one summit; because the first is the long upper or culminating line of a chain of mountains, the second only a point. Cumbre has therefore been translated by crest in the British and Foreign State Papers (1880-81, vol. 72, p. 1103), when dealing with the treaty of 1881; because in the Cordillera the...
