Excerpt: the Botany of Birds nests; and that accounts for what I have to say further on. The staple articles of diet among the Fringillidae are the seeds of the golden rods, wild sunflowers (the seeds of which are widely known in Massachusetts as Devil s Pitchforks), red alder berries, mullen. wild peppergrass, burdock and the milkweeds, chiefly because these plants constitute a never-failing crop, and are nearly always accessible, for even the deepest snow never covers them all; the tall stalks of the plants bearing the seedvessels aloft and ever in reach of the hungry multitude. V Then, too, there are all the grasses, too numerous to mention, and are invariably liked by all seed-eating birds, and there are many other plants to which single or a few species resort. The Pine Finches, when they are here at all, and the Thistle Birds are...
