Excerpt: .The moment that the news of this move arrived at Corinth, the government of that city sent a counter-embassy to persuade the Athenians to refuse the petition of their enemies. Thus it came to pass that on the day on which the Corcyraean ambassadors appeared before the Ecclesia with their propositions, the Corinthians were also present to set forth the arguments against the conclusion of the alliance. Thucydides has nreserved for us the substance of the speeches 433 Rc. Quarrel of Corinth and Corcyra, 285 made by the rival envoys on this occasion; though expressed in his own language, they fairly represent the arguments employed during the debate, at which the historian himself was probably present. The Corcyraeans appealed entirely to the self-interest of Athens; they acknowledged that they had no moral claim for her assistance, but pointed out that they possessed the second largest navy in Greece, and that, if they were allowed to fall under the power of Corinth, that navy might at any time be turned against Athens. They declared that war between Athens and the Peloponnesian alliance, of which Corinth was such a prominent member, was certain to break out ere long, and asked whether it was better that the Corcyraean fleet should be found on that day on the side of Athens, or on that of her enemies. As to the idea that the conclusion of an alliance with themselves would bring on an immediate war with Corinth and...
