The major test objectives of SIT were to prepare for later fully integrated oxygen with water recovery testing in the metabolic simulation testing to follow, as such to identify integration problems and focus on determining areas where further testing is needed to prove the integration concept is viable. Secondly, the trace contaminant control system (TCCS) was integrated and monitored differ-ently in phase III than in phase II. Direct integration with the Bosch was implemented to process product gases of the carbon dioxide reduction design. Finally, the phase III SIT subsystems ran completely integrated for approximately 5 of the II days, whereas the phase II SIT ran completely integrated for 2 days. 2. 0 SYSTEM DESIGN PERFORMANCE The SIT configuration utilized four air revitalization subsystems, baselined by Boeing, located inside the module simulator at MSFC. These four subsystems were the static feed electro-lyzer (SFE) oxygen generation subsystem, the four-bed molecular sieve (4BMS) carbon dioxide removal subsystem, the Bosch, and the TCCS. A facility simulator of the temperature and humidity control system (THCS) was also located inside the module to provide ventilation and sensible and latent heat removal inside the module. Located outside the module and inside a control room were performance diagnostic units (PDU), used to monitor the SFE and Bosch, and the facility-provided Systems and Components Automated Test System (...)
